33. As you may know, Medicare is the federal government-funded program that provides health care to qualifying people over the age of sixty-five. The federal government spends a great deal of money each year on Medicare and is going to eventually have to make changes to the program--such as reducing benefits for Medicare recipients, raising recipients' out-of-pocket costs, or both--in order to ensure Medicare's long-term financial stability. Do you think that these types of changes to Medicare should be dealt with now, or put off until some time in the future?
